Q, q, Latin, Q, q, Ital. 𝔔, 𝔮, black Engliſh. Concerning the origin, power, and uſe of this letter, the antient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern critics. Some of them took it to be ſuperfluous, and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how or whence it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refuſed to uſe it at all. Some uſed c for it indifferently, and writ pequnia, loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum, V. Silburg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence ſome learned moderns finding many words of this kind; others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, muſt conſequently have ſuppoſed vulgar cuſtom, and a ſhorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Feſtus, and long before him Ennius, who writ ſometimes cuando, and ſometimes quando. And indeed cuſtom at this day allows to write cocus, hircus, cum, cur, cotidie, and many others, or coquus, hirquus, quum, &c. promiſcuouſly. From ſuch examples, and the frequent changes of each of theſe into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lictum, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the ſame organ, eſpecially in mutes of the ſame rank, ſome have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforeſaid, but ſhewed us the ſeparate parts in this figure C<. Theſe writ ſometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cuæ, cuid, which Voſſius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and ſeems to think both letters ſuperfluous. As to the figure, 'tis juſt as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Tully, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo; becauſe Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoquus was writ, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himſelf, who tells us (Lib. XII, 10.) this letter made ſyllables harſh; which ſurely cannot well agree to the ſound of k. Beſides, he ſaith in the ſame place, that Q had a ſound unknown to the Greeks (which certainly it had, and for that reaſon not adopted in their alphabet, of which more below) which evidently proves the Romans ſounded it not as k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the antient writers nor the modern were aware of, hath not eſcaped the ſagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from ק. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, ſo from koph, koppa; but finding they had no occaſion for it in their alphabet, gave it however a place among their numerals, calling it κόππα ἐπίσημον. For the ſame reaſon alſo, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of Βαῦ ἐπίσημον. On the very ſame account, tzade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but aſſigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harſher, made uſe of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, two medials in each order; the ſound of the one ſo differing from its neighbour, as the firſt from the laſt: the two medials in the firſt order were ב and ו, or B and V; in the ſecond ג and ק, or G and Q. In the third ד and צ, or D and Z. But the ſmoother tongue of the Greeks refuſing the latter in each order, made them amends ſuitable to their rank, placing the firſt in their units, the ſecond in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whoſe language was perhaps not much ſofter than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greek, found themſelves obliged to reſtore theſe numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαῦ, or, which is the ſame, the Æolian digamma ꟻ made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that ſound; and from the Greek Κόππα their Q. This letter, I obſerve, the Latins muſt have ſounded quoppa, if the opinion of ſeveral antient and modern critics may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the ſake of its V, to give it a broader ſound, as it is very probable the original ק had in Hebrew to diſtinguiſh it from כ, whence the Greeks had their Κάππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third ἐπίσημον, Σάν πι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tſade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken, not from the Greek Ζῆτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, becauſe the Latin z hath a very hard ſound, as the dental צ hath, whereas the Greek ζῆτα was ſo ſoft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it from them ſometimes, to avoid uſing their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew צ, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII, 10. and in the ſame place will ſcarce allow ו, that is, F, to have an humane ſound; which ſurely is ſofter than צ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have ſhewn before. Hence 'tis evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator diſlikes as letters all the three Ἐπίσημα: and the doctor confeſſes the figure of Z comes nearer צ, and the ſmall z nearer to the final ץ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is eaſily made from Ϙ, by ſhutting the ſemicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and Ϙ quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ק, when, in compliance to the weſtern way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are ſettled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my diſſent, ſince it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor thoſe ſince invented, whether neceſſary or compendiary: beſides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea, Quintilian farther obſerves, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that ſo broad and harſh a ſound ſhould be taken into the Latin alphabet, which ſo embaſed the Roman, when compared with the Greek elocution. I ſhould next ſhew its mutual intercourſe with its ſiſter mutes; but I have already made the longeſt preface to one of the ſhorteſt letters, and therefore ſhall only obſerve, that the reſemblance and ſound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial ſiſter G, than to C or K her other ſiſters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, in the ſame ſyllable ſometimes, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q doth always: which v, whether it be a vowel or a conſonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, I had better inquire in that letter than here. R, r, Greek Ῥ, ῥ, Hebr. ר Reſch, from ריש an head, which the figure in ſome ſort repreſents, in Syriac ראי Roë, from which the Greek Ῥ Rhô. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by miſtake or deſign, took the figure of their R, as alſo the ſmaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inſerted the Hebrew Q, and conſidered that the figure of the Greek rhô was the very ſame with their P, for diſtinction, an appendage or tail was by them added to it. But undoubtedly he is miſtaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments ſtill remaining, that the moſt antient Greeks had both Ῥ and R in their alphabet: witneſs the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critic and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inſcript. p. 27, where we find this form R at leaſt ſeven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almoſt the ſame with that of the antient Greeks. It ſeems more probable to me, that the Latins obſerving the Greeks to have two characters for one ſound, which they had not in the reſt, viz. Ῥ and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure moſt ſignificant of the power of half the B, as P is. This eaſy conjecture if none hath made before, muſt have happened by not obſerving the antient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhô. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put laſt of all her ſiſter liquids, undeſervedly, being indeed τῶν ἡμιφώνων γενναιότατον, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſ. calleth it; and might pretend to the firſt place, ſince, though not fully, yet more of it may be ſounded without a vowel than any of the reſt. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a ſyllable pure, and takes before it an aſpiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. Whether the aſpiration ought to be ſounded before or after this letter, is not agreed on: reaſon, and the cuſtom of the Æolians, who prefixed ſometimes Ⅎ and ſometimes β before it, makes for the former opinion; and the uſe of the Latins, who write rhamnus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may ſeem to countenance the latter, But I obſerve that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aſpiration, as in radix, rigeo, roſa, and in other words at pleaſure either omitted or inſerted it, as in raphanus and rhaphanus, romphæa, or rhomphæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it all; and indeed this ſound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but ſo as vibrated by a quaver of the tongue and alliſion on the teeth, it makes a ſound like the grinning of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, gave it ſo ſoft and liſping a ſound, that in writing they ſometimes omitted it, calling the Etruſci Thuſci, or Tuſci; and eſpecially before ſ; thus Ennius writ proſus, ruſus, for prorſus, rurſus: which is leſs to be wondered at, becauſe the moſt antient Latins doubled not their conſonants. Yea, the ſound of this liſped r was ſo near that of its neighbour ſ, that they writ aſa, caſmen, Papyſii, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers ſtill, as particularly in the prince of poets arbos and honos frequently occur; and labos, vapos, &c. in others. But the ſoft ſound of this letter is in nothing more plain, than its interpoſition to hinder the colliſion of two vowels, as if it had been little more than a breathing, as in murex, nurus, from μύαξ, νυὸς. But to proceed: Though the grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to ſay nothing of the reſt here, this has not only an intercourſe with the ſiſterhood, but often with ſeveral of the mutes. Firſt with her ſiſter l, as from puer, puera, puella; ſo from κανθήλιος is made cantherius; and as cælulius was antiently writ for cæruleus, ſo on the contrary latiaris for latialis. With her ſiſter m the inſtances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from δῶρον and πλήρης, are donum and plenus, ſo from μόνος Æol. μένος, and from μόνα, are merus and mora. In ſome words r or n are writ indifferently, as in æreus or æneus. I will inſtance as briefly as I can the intercourſe of this liquid with ſome of the mutes: with c, as paucus from παῦρος; with d, corium from κώδιον, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus; and antiently ar in many words was uſed for ad, as in arlabi, arfinis, arvorſus, for adlabi, &c. with g, as from ἄρνη agna, ſo ſeges from ſerere. This letter by poets is uſed in deſcribing motion, noiſe, indignation, or violence, Vid. Voſſ. Inſt. Orat. 4, 2. R. in the notes of the antients, R. or Ro. ſignifies Roma; R.C. S, The Latin capital is taken with very little or no variation from the antient Greek alphabet, and is at leaſt of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ); and from this drawn into a ſmaller form is made s, which is uſed only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendiary note ς for στ. The Greeks have another, but leſs antient figure of this letter, viz. C, from which the ſmaller initial and medial ϲ is ſometimes uſed. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phenician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew ש ſin, by drawing it in a jacent, inſtead of an erect Form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σὰν ſan, though the Ionians called it σίγμα ſigma, from the Chaldean סמכא ſimcha, by tranſpoſing the ſecond and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the ſmall form of the Greek ſigma ς, being no other than the Hebrew ס turned to the right hand in complaiſance to the weſtern way of writing. But there are ſtrong reaſons to think ס ſamech only a ſecondary letter, ſubſtituted for ש ſin, the better to diſtinguiſh it from ש ſchin; wherein they had done wiſely, provided they had exterminated ש ſin, which now ſeems ſupernumerary, becauſe both theſe letters ש and ס, have one and the ſame ſound, as appeareth from the Ephraimitiſh pronunciation of Shibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, ſan being ſo called from ſin, before ſamech was introduced; and ſigma from ſamech, after ſuch introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admit this letter into no claſs in the diſtribution of their alphabet, whether in honour to it, as being inveſted with a deſpotic power peculiar to itſelf, or in diſhonour, looking upon it only as a ſubſtitute and attendant on the reſt, is uncertain; but I ſhould think the latter, ſince its ſervile offices are ſo very many in declining their nouns, and conjugating their verbs more eſpecially. For in all future tenſes of verbs baryton, and all the tenſes derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is ſervile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this ſervile uſe probably may have been the reaſon why ſome among the Greeks have accounted it only an aſpiration; in which number was Plato the philoſopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek ſpirits changed into this letter: into the lenis, as in ἔμμι ſum, ὀπὸς ſuccus; the aſpirate more frequently, as in ἅλς ſal, ἕξ ſex, ἑπτὰ ſeptem. This may likewiſe have occaſioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tego, fallo, from ςέγω, σφάλλω, and ſometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from ſpuma. Certain it is that ſome learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent uſe of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comic poets, made ſport in the theatre with this verſe of Euripides, Ἔσωσα σ' ὡ; ἴσασιν Ἑλλήνων ὅσοι. Yea Pindar was ſo unjuſtly ſevere, that he writ ſeveral odes without it: and the whole Spartan nation preferred the canine ſnarl of ῥ to the ſerpentine hiſs of ſ. The Romans alſo melted it ſo much, eſpecially in the end of words, as ſcarcely to be heard; inſomuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comic poets neglect it, as in audin'? credin'? dabin'? for audiſne, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the ſame, as, Deſpectus tibi ſum, nec qui ſum, quæris, Alexi; orators alſo forbid this in their compoſitions. Yea the antient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleaſed, cut it off in the end of a word before a ſhort, and ſometimes a long ſyllable in the following word, as is manifeſt in that of Ennius, Egregiè cordatus homo catu' Ælius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Nævius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himſelf this liberty. But though in general this ſound may ſeem to have been unpleaſant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the moſt that is ſaid againſt it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper uſe. The Latins, in making ſome Greek words denizons of Rome, prefix this letter, as in ſcribo, ſmaragdus, ſtella, from γράφω, μάραγδος, τέλλω; and even ſt antiently, as in ſtlitem, ſtlocum, in words of their own tongue: ſometimes they interpoſe it, as in diſcus, muſca, from δίκω, μυῖα. The Greeks alſo in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as, Νȣμᾶς, Φιμβρίας, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in cauſſa, caſſus, for cauſa, caſus, v. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugating Latin verbs, it is ſubſtituted for almoſt all the conſonants, as in arſi from ardeo, terſi from tergeo, vexi for vecſi, from veho, vulſi from vello, preſſi from premo, poſui from pono, repſi from repo, torſi from torqueo, uſſi from uro, verſum from verti, as grammarians obſerve; but this to me ſeems not ſo much a ſubſtitution, as a ſervile formative power given it in Latin, as, I have obſerved before, it had in the Greek tongue. This ſemivowel, for ſo the Latins ſeem to acknowledge it, by prefixing e as they do before the other liquids, admitteth after it of the mutes, c, p, q, t, as in ſcapha, ſpes, ſqualor, ſtadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only, in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourſe between this, and its neighbour R, ſee that letter. S. in proper names, is read Sextus; SP. Spurius. In appellatives, S. A. Secundum artem; SC. Senatuſconſultum; S. P. Q. R. Senatus populuſque Romanus; S. S. S. Stratum ſuper ſtratum; S. V. B. E. E. Q. V. Si vales bene eſt, ego quoque valeo; a form uſed in Cicero's time, in the beginning of letters.
